

二、Recently, domestic universities are incentivizing instructors to give professional lectures in English, a decision that I applaud and fully support. Globalization is an irreversible trend, thus necessitating robust and mutually beneficial relationships with foreign academics, business leaders, or statesmen. If we are to stay afloat amidst an increasingly volatile geopolitical environment, international collaboration is crucial to individual or communal interests, and I opine that dismantling the language barrier is the first thing to do to facilitate the exchange of information and innovation beyond national borders. Frequent exposure to English at an early age is thereby essential to engender more confidence in using a foreign language and elevate the alacrity of younger generations to converse with foreigners. Furthermore, if professional knowledge is conferred to undergraduates in English, young academics would find it easier to access, comprehend, and retain knowledge from a foreign publication or a thesis. This ability to obtain firsthand information would grant us a competitive edge whenever we conduct research or apply to a prestigious multinational enterprise.

Should my college present a curriculum that fully incorporates English, I believe my proficiency in the language and fondness for digesting anything written in this language would allow me to acclimatize myself to the new paradigm of learning swiftly. I deduce that it would elevate my interest in many academic subjects that I previously abhor, therefore having a profound positive effect on my overall academic performance. Besides, I plan to read a profusion of related articles in news outlets like CNN or The New York Times to acquaint myself with the rudiments of a given subject, especially its lexicon, before class commences. In addition to that, I would read English novels and watch <sup>English</sup> films that are affiliated with my courses to gain further insight and nurture a genuine liking for various fields of knowledge, so that my education will never be an onerous undertaking, and that I could proactively engage in meaningful activities throughout my life. The secret to learning is simple: the integration of education and entertainment, and that is the strategy I will adopt to adjust myself.
